Ticket to Work Newsletter

May 2019

Hello again - We're back with our newsletter for May! In this edition, we share upcoming training on Customised Employment, an article on the changing world of work for young people with disability, Matt's story about setting up his own microbusiness, and we review what the literature says about young people with intellectual disabilities working in after-school jobs.

Upcoming training

Introduction to Customised Employment Techniques

This two-day specialised training program focuses on how to use the Customised Employment approach and Discovery Process. The training will support you to develop the knowledge, tools and resources necessary to support people with significant disability who want to work.

Spreading the word

The changing world of work, and young people with disability

The changing world of work will benefit people with disability if they are given the right supports; including opportunities for skills development, career education and pathway planning.

Success stories

Matt's story

Matt turned his passion for engine and machines into his very own business. "I love fixing them and it makes me happy seeing these machines working after working on them."

Literature Review

Over 60 per cent of secondary students have an after-school job, yet for many students with disability, they are unable to get support they need to participate in a job while at school. This could put them at a further disadvantage when trying to access employment post-school.

Ticket to Work has embarked on a project to explore the effects of after-school jobs on young people with disability. We partnered with Latrobe University to evaluate and explore the experiences of students. Latrobe has now completed a paper into the peer-reviewed literature.
